CAREFUL PLANNING ADVISED FOR WATER SYSTEMS ON FARMS

Farmers thinking of installing a water system should do some careful planning, says J. A. Waller, Jr., associate agricultural engineer at V. P. I.

Although hydraulic rams, and gravity systems with springs as the source of water are satisfactory under some conditions, most farmers will use automatic electric pumps, Waller says.

His advice on choosing the automatic pumps:

Be sure the source of water is pure and dependable before putting in a power pump. The spring or well should have a strong flow, even in periods of dry weather, and should be protected from contaminating surface water.

Select a pump that is capable of supplying your daily needs of water in two hours of pumping. Your county agent can help you estimate the amount of water you will use each day. Various types and sizes of water systems are available to meet individual needs.

Protect the pump from rain, snow and freezing. Some installations can be made in the basement, others must be placed in a pit or insulated pump house. If you put the pump in a pit, it can be placed below frost level. A pump house is easy to drain and ventilate, and the pump is accessible for maintenance.

TOLD TO INVESTIGATE SOURCE OF PLANTS

Tobacco growers are warned not to buy tobacco plants this season before carefully investigating the source.

S. B. Fenne, plant disease specialist at V.P.I., says there is always danger of buying plants infected with granville wilt or blackshank. There is definitely a plant shortage in the flue-cured tobacco counties, where blue mold has almost completely wiped out the plant beds, Fenne said; and many growers will be at least two weeks before they can get enough plants to set in the field.

The specialist said "because of the mild outbreak of blue mold last year, our growers have become careless in applying fermate. However, about 25 per cent of the growers used fermate properly, and possibly there will be enough plants to set the state's acreage from those sprayed beds."
